National Constitutional Identity and European Integration. 'National constitutional identity' has become the new 'buzz word' in European constitutionalism over the past few years. Much has been written about the concept. This collection brings together a series of contributions from the perspective of both scholars and judges in order to shed some light over the dark corners of constitutional identity.

European Integration and National Identity The Challenge ...

In Germany, participation in European integration to a large degree is seen as a substitute for the lost national identity and pride (Haller, 1999). 14 From this point of view, the emergence of the European Union can be seen as an attempt to establish a new type of nation, maybe even a “supra-nation” (Galtung, 1973).

Identity building: How is Europe different from the nation ...

This is important to recognize because it reflects a long-standing attitude toward the relationship between European integration and national identity amongst post-communist states. Following the end of the Cold War, central and east European states sought to determine their ethnic or national security by reasserting national sovereignty.

Early theorists of European integration speculated that economic integration would lead to political integration and a European identity. A European identity has not displaced national identities in the EU, but, for a significant share of EU citizens, a European identity exists alongside a national identity. At the same time, political parties asserting more traditional nationalist identities and policies have directed their dissatisfaction against immigrants, foreigners and, sometimes, the EU.

European Integration, Nationalism and European Identity

A model of support for European integration is developed that suggests that feelings of national identity are highly important in an individual's choice to support the EU. The impacts of three alternative conceptualizations of national identity are tested.
